

“Ah! I’m a Slime!”

Narrative

Kit Hoai Lac Chung

Part 1 - Awakening

Part 2

Part 3

Part 4

Part 5 - Mimic's lair and ending

Finally, with the end feeling near, you arrive at the heart of the Mimic's lair.

Bad ending

You see a faint light on the other side. You know you have two options: Cautious and attentive, using your senses to carefully sneak past the Mimic hiding in plain sight; or reckless with haste, betting everything on your ability to reach the other side before it reaches you. Either option gets you to the other side when done right, and as you approach, you realize it's a sealed tunnel. You think to yourself, a sealed tunnel with danger at the entrance; there must be safety on the other side. With that in mind, you do the only thing you can, you use your Fireball to blow the blockage. Now, alerted by the explosion, the Mimic knows you are close to escape. It does everything it can to hunt you down one last time. You flee away in terror. The tunnel is long, treacherous and winding. There's numerous traps and blockages along the way. You use every ability you've gained since your awakening and narrowly escape; sealing off the Mimic's pursuit at the same time. You've made it to the exit, the faint light you saw earlier is now brighter than ever. Finally safe from the monster filled world, you exit the Mimic's lair.

The other side is bright, vibrant, and colourful. Life is abundant and there is energy in the air. You move freely through the open field and encounter a small creature. It stands straight, with its head held high, walking on two legs without its arms. With no fur, it covers itself in something you've never seen. It briefly leaves when it spots you, but comes back with bigger versions of itself. Then, it points at you.

"A monster got out!" One of them yells. "How? They got past the blockage and traps? How many?" Another shouts out in fear. "We can do a search after, but we need to kill this one before it spreads!" You hear from the mob. Suddenly, the bright and warm landscape turns dark and cold. The creatures raise various sticks, some sharp and some with fire, with savagery in their eyes. They chase you down, but you flee away. You manage to find a low hiding place and puddle below like always. But unlike always, these monsters are intelligent. They easily find you and tear you away from your hiding spot. They use their sticks to cut you, burn you, and rip you apart until there's nothing left. In the end, there was no safety in this world.

True ending

Although you see a faint light on the other side, you choose to be reluctantly brave. You know you must face the Mimic. Either it notices you now, while you're trying to sneak past, or just as you're about to escape; the only sure way to grant your safety is to kill it before it kills you. Whatever the case, you face it in fear. Its shapeshifting ability makes it a challenging battle, forcing you to use all your abilities to evade fatal attacks and to counter back. But it's not impossible, after the long battle the Mimic runs out of forms and tricks. You deliver the final blow and as it dies, it burrows away from you in fear. You follow its path, which is straight and gradually gets narrower and narrower. Finally, it connects to the end of the tunnel. The faint light you saw earlier is now brighter than ever, and just before the exit, is the small and dying mimic. Looking at the once terrorizing monster in such a weak state, you know what must be done. Before leaving, you consume the Mimic, remembering you're a monster yourself and gaining its ability to shapeshift as a result. With that being the end, you exit the tunnel.

The other side is bright, vibrant, and colourful. Life is abundant and there is energy in the air. You move freely through the open field and encounter a small creature. It stands straight, with its head held high, walking on two legs without its arms. With no fur, it covers itself in something you've never seen. It briefly leaves when it spots you, but before it comes back you shapeshift into it. The creature comes back with bigger versions of itself, and although your mimicry isn't exact, they see you as one of their own.

“Poor child” One says compassionately. “Where did you come from?” Without knowing the language, you look at them puzzled, not knowing how to respond. “Do you not remember?” They ask. “It’s okay. You must be scared and hungry, waking up with no memory. Come now, our village is nearby and has food and shelter. We can take care of you until you remember.” You walk off with the creatures, feeling their warmth and compassion. In the end, you finally found safety from the monster filled world.